This webinar series will offer an in-depth look at relational difficulties in the therapeutic relationship with clients who have complex trauma-related disorders, ranging from Complex PTSD to OSDD to DID. An initial overview of these disorders and their treatment will be offered as a foundation for the remainder of the course. We will explore how to manage extreme avoidance and defenses, particularly that which manifests as protections against the therapeutic relationship. A perspective on trauma-related phobias will be shared, with emphasis on how to overcome these phobias, particularly the phobia of attachment and of attachment loss. A unique perspective on ways clients use relational strategies that emerge from other innate motivational systems besides attachment will be discussed. Both transference and countertransference issues will be explored. These include not only devaluation, rage, shame, and disappointment, but also idealization and positive emotions that can potentially interfere with effective therapy.

While safe attachment is always emphasized as being important in therapy, we will explore the types of boundaries and limits that are essential and what kind of relational strategies are helpful, as well as ways to manage dependency compassionately and effectively on the therapist. In addition, we will explore how to effectively and safely work with self-harm and suicidality, and how to understand somatic symptoms such as dissociative communications. Finally, we will explore important aspects of self-care for therapists, including how to recognize and resolve vicarious traumatization and burnout.

Objectives

Participants will be able to:

1. Name the major criteria and differences between the complex trauma-related disorders

2. Name the three major phases of treatment for complex trauma and dissociation
3. List the major trauma-related phobias and their basic treatment
4. List and discuss the implications of motivational systems in working with relational challenges in complex trauma and dissociation
5. Employ at least four interventions to work with relational defenses
6. Discuss implications of both positive and negative transference and countertransference in the treatment of complex trauma and dissociation.
7. Identify specific boundaries and limits that are important in treatment and discuss when and when not to flex these.
8. Employ effective strategies to identify and work with maladaptive dependency in the therapeutic relationship
9. Assess self-harm and suicidality in clients with complex trauma and employ at least five interventions to improve safety and regulation.
10. Identify symptoms of dissociative distancing, amnesia, and other types of non-realization and employ strategies to improve clients' ability to accept and integrate their past and present experiences.
11. Analyze somatic and functional systems that may have dissociative communications and explain how to work with these effectively
